Parthenogenetic activation and nuclear transfer in domestic hens by the use of laparoscopic ovum pick-up. The process of fertilization and subsequent embryogenesis in domestic hens is poorly understood. The aim of this work was to develop a method of artificially activating quiescent ova. In total, three consecutive trials were conducted to evaluate the ability of laparoscopy to activate and cryopreserve quiescent quail (Coturnix coturnix japonica) quail oocytes and the rate of recovery of hatched chicks after application of laparoscopic surgery. In the first trial, laparoscopic ovum pick-up (LOPU) was used to simultaneously obtain oocytes and laparoscopically-activated oocytes from hens before in vivo fertilization and culture to investigate the potential of the laparoscopic method. Although the number of eggs collected was less than that in the conventional oviduct flushing method, all 15 laparoscopically-activated oocytes survived in the laparoscopic surgery group. In the second trial, laparoscopic ovum pick-up was performed to obtain laparoscopically-activated oocytes from in vivo fertilized and cultured eggs. A total of 29 quail were collected, with 16, 10 and 3 recovered from LOPU, and 23 quail were recovered from in vivo fertilized, laparoscopically-activated and laparoscopically-activated and in vivo fertilized eggs, respectively. By laparoscopically-activated and in vivo fertilized eggs, there was a higher rate of recovery of quail eggs collected at 1, 2, 3.
