Nurses and nurse aides, not students, are at highest risk of sexual violence A new study shows that the women least likely to report sexual assault, and thus least likely to be identified by the police, are nurse aides and nurses Jessica O'Hara is a tenured associate professor in the School of Nursing at the University of Washington and the director of the Sexual Violence Research and Training Program at the Fred Hutchinson Cancer Research Center. I've been an oncology nurse at Seattle Children's Hospital since 2006. During that time, I have cared for scores of patients who are survivors of sexual abuse or sexual assault. I am profoundly disappointed with the lack of acknowledgement that most sexual assault and sexual violence takes place in the health care system, especially in hospitals. We do not have enough research on this problem to confidently say whether most victims of sexual violence are hospital patients.

But it is clear that most sexual assaults and sexual violence in hospitals happen in the context of a health care system. I think many nurses are surprisingly unaware of this reality. Because the vast majority of sexual assaults take place in people's homes, in the street, or in other places where nurses cannot feasibly intervene, nurses may be inclined to believe that nurses or patients are least likely to be sexually assaulted or harassed in the hospital setting. The truth is that the group least likely to report sexual assault are the women who are most

Flatsch is an easy-to-use program to remind yourself to blink. You will see a fish on your screen every few seconds, as if someone was looking out for you and wanted to blink. Furthermore, you will hear a sound effect whenever the fish is shown on the screen. The test that we were going to perform today had a simple aim. Using this application we wanted to check how its performance was affected by the flash on the screen. And we wanted to test this in its most common usage scenario, i.e. when the user is switching windows. On the basis of our previous research, we prepared a good chunk of tests. Some of them are based on real scenarios, as we think that they should be the easiest and the most relevant. On the other hand, other tests were prepared on the basis of our expectations about how the software should behave. The test was performed in the following way. We started by turning the flash on and off, with a five second interval between each change, and then we immediately switched to a fresh window. Then we repeated the same procedure, only this time we switched the flash on and off every two seconds. In addition to this, we tested the program's behaviour when we closed a window with a flash on, and when we closed it with a flash off. Note that we have tested the program in three Windows version: 10, 7 and XP. The results for these tests can be seen in the table below.
