Q: RabbitMQ - Listening queue If we have a concept of 'listening queue', so that all messages are processed. But what happens to the messages that were in the process of been processed? Can we send the messages back to where they came from? Thanks A: There is no such thing as "listening" queue - you can have queues that automatically reject new messages, or listen for specific events, but there is no queue that does both. That said, messages still receive acknowledgements when consumed. The behavior of the consumer is controlled by the consumer options. Setting the auto_ack property to false, the consumer will issue an acknowledgement when a consumer dies, or when its memory requirements surpass a configurable limit.
