And while she couldn’t predict the outcome, she said she hoped prosecutors wouldn’t “ease up” with her client in the interest of avoiding a potential trial. “We are committed to making sure that justice is done,” she said. Grisly Career Defending a case like Hinckley’s is personal for law professors and criminal defense attorneys who have seen first-hand the impact of mental illness and the need for the mental health system to reevaluate the work it does. It has long been common for defense attorneys to argue that those found not guilty by reason of insanity should be released. But the circumstances in Hinckley’s case, the prosecution, and the family’s outrage in general have shifted the conversation to the broader availability and use of mental health treatment — especially for people with schizophrenia, the prevalent diagnosis in Hinckley’s case. Hinckley’s trial attorneys, B.J. Lally and E. Paul Tabler, taught criminal law at Suffolk University Law School for decades. Tabler died in 2012. In the early years of his career, Tabler said he met him in court on at least a dozen occasions and his client repeatedly refused to take medication prescribed to treat his schizophrenia. “He just couldn’t understand that you shouldn’t be creating a public disturbance if you are sick,” Tabler said. On the other hand, he said he doesn’t think it was unusual or inappropriate for Hinckley’s attorneys to contact the judge in the 12 years between the time Hinckley was acquitted and his sentencing to urge that he be allowed to live in a halfway house where he would receive treatment. “I don’t remember any instance where I felt that what they were saying was inappropriate,” he said. In light of what happened in the Hinckley case, Tabler said he sees the need for mental health professionals to take on the burden of delivering treatment — a role currently met by court-appointed experts and state mental health facilities. Such experts, Tabler said, “need to take on more responsibility.” “People 648931e174

But if you are interested in potentially relevant bugs, be sure to sign up for Firefox’s Bugzilla which has a listing of every known bug in every version of Firefox. It has enough internal politics to discourage casual participation, but I’ve found it to be a very useful resource in my work as a Firefox developer. If you can’t get in the way of firefox engineering you can at least help out with the testing - more than anything else, a bug report will tell you what mozilla engineers were working on and what needs consideration and the programmer will mostly just need to reproduce the problem and contribute to the discussion as required. I hope this didn’t come across as negative, but a lot of people seem to be confused about Firefox and users of that particular web browser have a couple of bad reputations. ----- jrockway My favorite new feature of Firefox 3 is the improved handling of Cocoa applications. There’s no longer a need for 30-50 NSWindows. Plus, they fixed the “maximize button is broken” problem. ----- jballanc I think the problem is that this web site is older than the latest nightly build of Firefox. Having said that, all of the pages in the latest nightly build of Firefox also fail to display properly. ----- kvnn I
