Applying the concept of culture to hospital clinical practice: the effect of the nursing culture in a medical centre of south China. Culture, according to the characteristics of a group, can be used to describe and evaluate the position of a group towards a set of important attributes which describe the behaviour of a group. We applied the culture concept to medical care, called nursing culture, to describe the position of a group of nursing care professionals. We identified the nursing culture of a medical centre by measuring the degree of consensus, defined as the level of agreement among a group of nursing care professionals about a set of major nursing care characteristics, and analysed the correlation between nursing culture and quality of nursing care. We also analysed the position of the nursing culture in relation to the clinical outcome in the centre. The 'nursing culture' in this study included the areas of: (1) nursing conditions, (2) nursing activities, (3) nursing
